offers a valuable opportunity for the business men of the city of Richmond to extend their interests to a portion of the State in which they are practically an unknown factor.

The morning papers of Washington, Haltimore and even Philadelphia and Now York, are delivered at the majority of the postoffices in Northern Virginia by noon at the latest on the day of publication, but the mail service from Richmond has been so uncertain that a morning paper from that city was hardly looked for under twenty-four hours: and as the husiness connections of the small towns and country districts with the cities are established more through newspaper advertisements and the daily market reports than any one other factor, the trade relations of this section with the capital of the State are very siender at present. But when the people of Northern Virginia and the Valley are assured that they can get in good time a morning paper containing, besides the regular market reports and all general news, the State news, they will prefer it, and right here is where the business near of the profitable trade in what has long been an unexplored region to them.
